

On a cold rainy evening in October, Anna found herself alone in her small cozy apartment. She loved nights like this, quiet, with the sound of raindrops tapping gently against the window. She had just settled down with a cup of tea and her favorite book when a knock on the door startled her.

Anna wasn't expecting anyone. She lived in a quiet neighborhood and visitors were rare, especially this late in the evening. She cautiously approached the door and peeked through the peephole. No one was there. Puzzled, she opened the door slowly and looked around. The rain was coming down in sheets, and the street was empty except for the occasional flicker of a passing car's headlights.

Just as she was about to close the door, she noticed something unusual: a letter, lying on the doorstep, soaked by the rain. Anna bent down and picked it up. The envelope was old; the paper yellowed with time, and her name was written on the front in an elegant, unfamiliar script. There was no return address.

Curiosity getting the best of her, she quickly tore open the envelope and pulled out a single sheet of paper. The handwriting inside was neat but slightly smudged from the dampness. The letter began with a strange greeting.
